

cold pavement as a luxurious carpet; a tapestry of the most excellent grey, ethereal in the haze of silver- luminous despite the dainty moonlight. here is where it ends, where pavement's mirror shatters in even pieces, and only her hardness is left as futile weight. but what can we do when there is no love left? when it's all over, where does it all go?